Fire Test for Rugs.

The dusky rug salesman took a redhot coal from the grate, and, holding it tight in the tongs, touched it to the splendid Persian rug.

"Oh!" gasped the visitor, as the costly rug sizzled and gave off a little smoke and an odor of burning. ligt the salesman smiled. He threw the coal back into the grate. He pointed to the charred spot, as big as a half dollar, on the rug's cream lored ground. "Regard, madam," he said. And with his hand he brushed the brown entirely away. In a moment nothing of it was left. The rug came forth from its flery ordeal the same as before, only, in that one spot, the fabric was perhaps an eighth of an inch
